Victims’ Appellate Rights

June 2017
Dear Chairs, Ranking Members, and Mr. Secretary:

We are pleased to submit this report of the Judicial Proceedings Since Fiscal Year 2012 Amendments Panel (JPP) on victims’ appellate rights. This report summarizes the JPP’s review of the rights of victims of sexual assault in the military appellate process. Included in the report are four recommendations addressing appellate counsel access to certain sealed materials, victim notice of appellate proceedings, victim standing in post-conviction appellate proceedings, and victim access to the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces under Article 6b of the Uniform Code of Military Justice.

To gather information for this report, the JPP held public meetings to hear from a former chief judge of the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces, former judges of the Service Courts of Criminal Appeals, military appellate defense and government counsel, special victims’ counsel and victims’ legal counsel, civilian appellate defense counsel, a policy advisor from the Department of Justice, and attorneys from victims’ rights organizations. In addition, the JPP received responses from the Services to a written request for information about appellate practice. The JPP also received numerous public comments addressing legislative proposals on victims’ appellate rights. The JPP expresses sincere appreciation to everyone who contributed to this report.
The JPP looks forward to continuing its review of military judicial proceedings for sexual assault crimes and addressing other topics in future reports.

Respectfully submitted,

Executive Summary

Over the past year, the Judicial Proceedings Panel (JPP) examined the rights of victims of sexual assault in the military appellate process and identified four main areas of concern: (1) appellate counsel access to certain sealed materials, including materials not released to counsel at trial; (2) victim notice of appellate proceedings; (3) victim standing in post-conviction appellate proceedings; and (4) victim access to the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces (CAAF) under Article 6b of the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ).

As part of its review, the JPP considered two legislative proposals: one submitted by the program managers of the special victims’ counsel and victims’ legal counsel programs, and one included as Section 547 of S. 2943, the Senate version of the Fiscal Year (FY) 2017 National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA). Both legislative proposals would allow victims to file pleadings as a “real party in interest” during appellate review. The JPP also analyzed a proposed amendment by the Joint Service Committee on Military Justice (JSC) to Rule for Courts-Martial (R.C.M.) 1103A(b)(4)(B), which addresses appellate counsel examination of sealed materials. In addition, the JPP received testimony from appellate judges, practitioners, and experts—including a former chief judge of the CAAF, former judges of the Service Courts of Criminal Appeals (CCAs), military appellate defense and government counsel, civilian appellate defense counsel, a policy advisor from the Department of Justice, and attorneys from victims’ rights organizations.

On the basis of testimony received and its own analysis and deliberations, the JPP makes four recommendations.

First, the JPP supports the JSC’s proposed amendment to R.C.M. 1103A(b)(4)(B)(i), which would permit appellate counsel examination of sealed materials released to counsel at trial upon a “colorable showing” that examination is reasonably necessary to a proper fulfillment of their responsibilities. However, the JPP finds that in situations in which sealed records are reviewed in camera by a military judge but not released to counsel at trial, both appellate counsel and the person whose records are about to be examined should be afforded notice and an opportunity to be heard. Therefore, the JPP recommends that the JSC revise its proposed amendment to R.C.M. 1103A(b)(4)(B)(ii) to include the following language: “Prior to a decision to permit examination of material described in this subparagraph, notice and an opportunity to be heard shall be given to any person whose records are about to be examined and to appellate counsel.”

Second, the JPP recommends that the Services formalize procedures to provide victims in sexual assault cases (1) with timely notice, unless declined, of significant appellate matters, including but not limited to the date and time of the filing of appellate pleadings and briefs, of any appellate courtroom proceedings, of the date when the case is taken under submission, and of the final decision and any opinion of any appellate court, and (2) with convenient access to any unsealed documents filed in the case, if requested. The JPP believes that such formalized procedures are necessary and appropriate to enable victims to stay apprised of events that may directly affect their rights and interests.
Third, the JPP supports victim standing in post-conviction appellate proceedings, but believes that the legislative proposals it considered are technically flawed. The JPP recommends that Congress revise Section 547(a) of S. 2943 to state:

SEC. 547. APPELLATE STANDING OF VICTIMS UNDER THE UNIFORM CODE OF MILITARY JUSTICE.

(a) APPELLATE REVIEW.—Section 806b of title 10, United States Code (article 6b of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended by adding at the end the following new subsection:

“(f) APPELLATE REVIEW.—(1) If counsel for the accused or the Government files appellate pleadings under section 866 or 867 of this title (article 66 or 67) calling into question a prior judicial ruling in the case on an issue as to which a victim previously had standing and was heard, during appellate review that same victim may respond in the same manner as a party regarding that same issue, including through a Special Victims’ Counsel under section 1044e of this title.”

Finally, the JPP recommends that Congress amend Article 6b of the UCMJ to grant the CAAF jurisdiction to hear a victim’s appeal if a CCA denies the victim’s petition for a writ of mandamus under Article 6b. The JPP believes that access to the CAAF is important to promote uniformity across the Services and to ensure civilian oversight of decisions affecting victims’ rights.
Summary of JPP Recommendations on Victims’ Appellate Rights*

Recommendation 43: The Joint Service Committee on Military Justice revise its proposed amendment to Rule for Courts-Martial (R.C.M.) 1103A(b)(4)(B)(ii) to include the following language: “Prior to a decision to permit examination of material described in this subparagraph, notice and an opportunity to be heard shall be given to any person whose records are about to be examined and to appellate counsel.”

- The JPP supports the JSC’s proposed amendment to R.C.M. 1103A(b)(4)(B)(i), which would allow appellate counsel to examine sealed materials released to counsel at trial upon a colorable showing that examination is reasonably necessary to a proper fulfillment of their responsibilities.

- The JPP finds that in situations in which sealed materials are reviewed in camera by a military judge but not released to counsel at trial, both appellate counsel and the person whose records are about to be examined should be afforded notice and the opportunity to be heard prior to a decision to permit examination of the sealed materials.

Recommendation 44: The Services formalize procedures to provide victims in sexual assault cases (1) with timely notice, unless declined, of significant appellate matters, including but not limited to the date and time of the filing of appellate pleadings and briefs, of any appellate courtroom proceedings, of the date when the case is taken under submission, and of the final decision and any opinion of any appellate court, and (2) with convenient access to any unsealed documents filed in the case, if requested.

- The JPP finds that the creation of a system similar to the federal Public Access to Court Electronic Records (PACER) system would enable all victims to receive appropriate notice of appellate proceedings. The JPP supports the provision in the Military Justice Act of 2016 that requires the development and implementation of a program for the military justice system dealing with case management, data collection, and data accessibility. However, the JPP recognizes that this program may not take effect until December 2020.

• The JPP finds that even though such a program will be created by the Military Justice Act of 2016, the Services need a more immediate process to address the lack of victim notice of appellate proceedings in the interim.

• The JPP finds that the Army practice of using a dedicated office to contact victims and provide them with status updates about the case on appeal is an exemplary best practice.

Recommendation 45: Congress revise Section 547(a) of S. 2943, the Senate version of the Fiscal Year 2017 National Defense Authorization Act, to state:

SEC. 547. APPELLATE STANDING OF VICTIMS UNDER THE UNIFORM CODE OF MILITARY JUSTICE.

(a) APPELLATE REVIEW.—Section 806b of title 10, United States Code (article 6b of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended by adding at the end the following new subsection:

“(f) APPELLATE REVIEW.—(1) If counsel for the accused or the Government files appellate pleadings under section 866 or 867 of this title (article 66 or 67) calling into question a prior judicial ruling in the case on an issue as to which a victim previously had standing and was heard, during appellate review that same victim may respond in the same manner as a party regarding that same issue, including through a Special Victims’ Counsel under section 1044e of this title.”

• The JPP supports victim standing in post-conviction appellate proceedings.

• The JPP finds that the original language in Section 547(a) of Senate Bill S. 2943 allowing victims to file appellate pleadings as a “real party in interest” would create confusion and would not clearly provide victims with standing in post-conviction appellate proceedings.

Recommendation 46: Congress amend Article 6b of the Uniform Code of Military Justice to grant the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces (CAAF) jurisdiction to hear a victim’s appeal if a Service Court of Criminal Appeals denies the victim’s petition for a writ of mandamus under Article 6b.

• The JPP finds that victims’ lack of access to the CAAF under Article 6b prevents civilian oversight of decisions by the Service Courts of Criminal Appeals that affect victims’ rights and creates the potential for lack of uniformity across the Services.

• The JPP finds that recent decisions by the CAAF indicate that Congress must expressly grant jurisdiction to the CAAF to review adverse decisions by the Service Courts of Criminal Appeals regarding victims’ writ petitions.
Since its inception in 2014, the Judicial Proceedings Panel (JPP) has, as part of its charter, reviewed issues surrounding the rights of victims of sexual assault in the military, including the development of the special victims’ counsel (SVC) and victims’ legal counsel (VLC) programs. In April 2016, the JPP invited the SVC and VLC program managers to provide an update on the status of their programs. Noting that the SVC and VLC programs have been in existence for more than two years, the program managers pointed out that many cases in which a victim was represented by counsel at trial are now being heard on appeal. SVCs and VLCs thus are now dealing with a new set of questions about the rights of victims of sexual assault at the appellate stage.

The SVC/VLC program managers highlighted four major concerns about the military appellate process. First, they expressed concern that sealed materials not released to counsel at trial are regularly being reviewed by appellate counsel on appeal. Second, they argued that current procedures for notifying victims when major events occur on appeal are insufficient. Third, they noted that victims lack standing in post-conviction appellate proceedings, and thereby are prevented from participating fully in the appellate process. Finally, they observed that victims currently do not have the ability to appeal to the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces (CAAF) in cases in which a Service Court of Criminal Appeals (CCA) denies a victim’s petition for a writ of mandamus under Article 6b of the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ).

At the request of JPP Chair Elizabeth Holtzman, the SVC/VLC program managers jointly submitted a legislative proposal addressing these concerns about the military appellate process. Among other things, the proposal advocated amending Article 6b of the UCMJ—the military's version of the federal Crime Victims' Rights Act—to allow victims to file appellate pleadings as a “real party in interest” and to require victim notice of appellate matters. The SVC/VLC program managers also submitted proposed amendments to Article 70 of the UCMJ on appellate counsel representation.1

The JPP analyzed the issues and concerns presented by the SVC/VLC program managers. In addition to reviewing the SVC/VLC program managers’ legislative proposal, the JPP considered Section 547 of Senate Bill S. 2943, a provision in the Senate version of the Fiscal Year 2017 National Defense Authorization Act that would have amended Article 6b to provide for victim standing in post-conviction appellate proceedings and victim notice of appellate matters.2 At its September and October 2016 public meetings, the JPP heard testimony from appellate judges, practitioners, and experts—including a former chief judge of the CAAF, former judges of the CCAs, military appellate defense and government counsel, civilian appellate defense counsel, a policy advisor from the Department of Justice, and attorneys from victims’ rights organizations—about the proposed changes to the appellate process. The JPP also received written comments from the Department of Defense Office of the General Counsel, current and former Service members, and victims’ rights organizations.

1 The full draft of the SVC/VLC program managers’ legislative proposal is attached as Appendix A.

2 The full draft of Section 547 of Senate Bill S. 2943 is attached as Appendix B. This section was not passed in the final version of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2017. The Joint Explanatory Statement of the Committee of Conference stated that “the conferees understand that the Judicial Proceedings Panel . . . will receive testimony and address this issue in future public meetings of the JPP. The conferees will reconsider this issue after receipt of the JPP recommendations.” See H.R. REP. NO. 114-840, at 1042–43 (2016) (Conf. Rep.).
The JPP recognizes a number of gaps in the current appellate process that affect victims of sexual assault in the military. This report examines the four areas of concern raised by the SVC/VLC program managers and makes recommendations.
II. Appellate Counsel Access to Certain Sealed Materials

A. Background and Current Practice

Historically, the military did not have clear procedures on access to sealed materials—including materials sealed under Military Rule of Evidence (M.R.E.) 412, covering the rape shield rule, and 513, covering the psychotherapist-patient privilege. Although military judges routinely sealed documents, the language used in their orders varied by case and by Service. The scope of a trial court’s sealing orders—including the extent to which those orders protected sealed exhibits post-trial, the length of time for which those exhibits would be sealed, and the mechanics of getting lawful access to them post-trial—was uncertain.3

The CAAF and its predecessor court, the Court of Military Appeals (COMA), issued a series of opinions in the 1990s addressing the issue of appellate counsel access to sealed records. In United States v. Branoff, the COMA held that the lower court had improperly denied appellate defense counsel access to sealed documents appended to the record that had been previously examined by trial defense counsel. The COMA found that since the trial defense counsel already had access to the sealed documents, “a subsequent order prohibiting additional disclosure to another member of that same defense team cannot realistically be considered proliferation.”4

In two later cases, United States v. Romano and United States v. Rivers, the CAAF addressed a different issue: whether appellate defense counsel should have access to sealed records reviewed in camera by the military judge but not disclosed to counsel at trial.5 In both of these cases, the CAAF found that the proper procedure was for the CCA to conduct its own in camera review of the undisclosed documents to determine if disclosure of any additional documents to appellate defense counsel was required. In Rivers, the CAAF noted that while the Supreme Court has recognized that “the eye of an advocate may be helpful to a defendant in ferreting out information . . . [it] also has recognized that the defense is not entitled to unrestricted access to government information.”6

In 2005, seeking to remove the uncertainty about appellate counsel’s authority to examine sealed materials in the absence of a court order, the President promulgated Rule for Courts-Martial (R.C.M.) 1103A.7 Under the current version of R.C.M. 1103A, “[r]eviewing and appellate authorities”—including appellate government counsel and appellate defense counsel—“may examine sealed matters when those authorities determine that such action is reasonably necessary to a proper fulfillment of their responsibilities[,]” “Sealed matters” have in the past included victims’ mental health records reviewed in camera by a military judge, not released to counsel at trial, and sealed and appended to the record of trial.\(^8\) R.C.M. 1103A specifies that appellate counsel shall not disclose sealed materials in the absence of prior authorization by the Judge Advocate General or appellate court.\(^9\)

According to the Drafter’s Analysis, R.C.M. 1103A was “designed to respect the privacy and other interests that justified sealing the material in the first place, while at the same time recognizing the need for certain military justice functionaries to review that same information. The rule favors an approach that relies on the integrity and professional responsibility of those functionaries, and assumes that they can review sealed materials and at the same time protect the interests that justified sealing the material in the first place.”\(^10\)

Since the rule’s implementation, the CCAs have followed its plain language and have allowed appellate counsel access to the record of trial, including sealed materials not released to counsel at trial. However, the CCAs have implemented different rules and procedures governing exactly how appellate counsel may examine these materials.\(^11\)

Under Army CCA Rule 30.4, attorneys of record in appellate cases must request permission of the clerk and coordinate review of sealed records with the Office of the Clerk of Court; they cannot photocopy or make alterations to the sealed materials.\(^12\) According to a former Army judge who appeared before the JPP, permission to access sealed materials is routinely granted, and counsel normally review the sealed records in the Clerk of Court’s Office.\(^13\)

While the Navy-Marine Corps CCA does not have a rule specifically governing appellate counsel access to sealed materials, Rule 1.3(c) requires that appellate counsel make a request to examine unclassified original records of trial and other official documents with the secretary for the panel of judges to which the case is assigned. The records must be examined in a designated area, and their removal from the court’s chambers is discouraged unless considered necessary and approved by the senior judge of the panel, or by his or her designee. Records of trial cannot be logged out for more than one workday.\(^14\)

In contrast to the rules of the Army and Navy-Marine Corps CCAs, Rule 23.3(f) of the Air Force CCA requires that counsel submit a motion to the court requesting authorization to review sealed exhibits and showing cause for such a request.\(^15\) A judge then rules on (1) whether the individual seeking access

8 The current version of Military Rule of Evidence 513 requires a military judge to make specific findings by a preponderance of the evidence prior to ordering the production of mental health records for in camera review. If the military judge determines that the records do not meet the requirements for one of the enumerated exceptions to the psychotherapist-patient privilege, the military judge will not order production or disclosure of these records. The records reviewed by the military judge in camera but not disclosed to counsel at trial are still appended to the record of trial, but must be sealed. See MCM, supra note 7, Mil. R. Evid. 513(e)(3); see also transcript of JPP Public Meeting 51–53 (Sept. 23, 2016) (testimony of Colonel (Retired) Denise Lind, U.S. Army, Former Senior Judge, U.S. Army Court of Criminal Appeals).

is an appropriate person to request records, and (2) whether the records being requested relate to an offense of which the accused was convicted.16 A presenter from the Air Force explained that the court usually grants such a motion about one month after appellate counsel files it; the court also issues a protective order prohibiting appellate counsel from disclosing the contents of the records. Counsel’s review of the materials takes place in a windowless court space similar to a sensitive compartmented information facility (SCIF) for handling classified information.17

Air Force appellate government counsel have opposed motions from appellate defense counsel for access to a victim’s sealed records in dozens of cases, requesting that the Air Force CCA conduct its own in camera review of the records prior to examination by appellate counsel. However, the Air Force CCA has declined to do so in each case, relying on the plain language of R.C.M. 1103A.18 As of September 2016, the CAAF also has denied all five petitions filed by Air Force appellate government counsel requesting an order directing the Air Force CCA to conduct an in camera review of a victim’s records prior to allowing appellate counsel to view any portions of the records not released to counsel at trial.19

B. Comparison to Civilian Practice

Unlike the military, state jurisdictions do not provide appellate defense counsel full access to sealed materials not released to counsel at trial, although the exact procedures vary by state. In many states, the appellate court will instead conduct its own in camera review of the contested records to determine if the trial court abused its discretion in refusing to disclose records to the defendant.20

The JPP heard testimony from civilian appellate defense counsel about procedures in their home states of Colorado and New Hampshire. Mr. Jason Middleton explained that appellate counsel in Colorado are able to see only the records that the parties at trial have seen. Therefore, if a trial court conducts an in camera review of sealed records, appellate counsel are not able to access the materials that were not disclosed at trial, but they can ask the appellate court to perform an in camera review to determine 20 See, e.g., People v. Bean, 560 N.E. 2d 258, 274–75 (Ill. 1990) (rejecting the defendant’s argument that his appellate counsel needed access to all of a witness’s privileged mental health records, including those not disclosed to the defendant’s trial counsel); People v. James, 5 P.3d 328 (Col. 2000) (finding that “[t]he propriety of the district court’s ruling [denying the defense access to confidential gang files] can be ensured by appellate court review of the sealed record without sacrificing the interest in nondisclosure or denying effective assistance of counsel to appellant”); In re Christopher G., 564 A.2d 619, 625 (Conn. 1989) (finding, after the appellate court conducted its own review of psychiatric records, that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to disclose the records); Commonwealth v. Feliciano, 816 N.E.2d 1205, 1209 (Mass. 2005) (finding that if a defendant satisfactorily met the standard triggering in camera review of a victim’s records at trial, and the defendant seeks review on appeal, an appellate court should review the judge’s in camera decision-making using a deferential abuse of discretion standard); Clifford S. Fishman, Defense Access to a Prosecution Witness’s Psychotherapy or Counseling Records, 86 Or. L. Rev. 1, 27 (2007).

whether those materials should have been disclosed. Mr. Chris Johnson described similar procedures for appellate counsel in New Hampshire.

C. Proposals and Considerations

At the JPP’s April 2016 public meeting, the program managers of the SVC and VLC programs expressed concern that privileged mental health records that were reviewed in camera by the judge, but not released to counsel at trial, were nevertheless being reviewed by appellate counsel on appeal under R.C.M. 1103A. Colonel Andrea deCamara, program manager for the Air Force SVC program, noted multiple instances in which appellate defense counsel had requested review of a victim’s sealed privileged mental health records on appeal.

Neither the SVC/VLC program managers’ legislative proposal nor Section 547 of Senate Bill S. 2943 directly addresses appellate counsel access to sealed materials of all kinds, but the Joint Service Committee on Military Justice (JSC) did release a proposal in November 2016 to amend R.C.M. 1103A. It provides separate procedures for appellate counsel depending on whether they are examining sealed materials reviewed by counsel at trial or sealed materials reviewed in camera by a military judge but not released to counsel at trial. Under section (b)(4)(B)(i) of the proposal, appellate counsel would be allowed to examine sealed materials reviewed by counsel at trial upon a “colorable showing” that examination is reasonably necessary to a proper fulfillment of their responsibilities. Members of the JSC Working Group described “colorable showing” as a low threshold. Under section (b)(4)(B)(ii) of the proposal, appellate counsel would be allowed to examine sealed materials not released to counsel at trial only if a “reviewing or appellate authority”—defined under the new proposal as including judges of the CCAs and CAAF and their professional staffs—first examines the materials and determines that there is “good cause” for appellate counsel to examine them.

Presenters appearing before the JPP expressed different views on whether R.C.M. 1103A should be modified to limit appellate counsel access to sealed materials not released to counsel at trial. Mr. Ryan Guilds, counsel at Arnold & Porter LLP who supervises a pro bono initiative to train and support volunteer lawyers representing sexual assault victims, described the detrimental effect on his clients each time a new person viewed their private mental health records. Even though R.C.M. 1103A prohibits appellate authorities from disclosing sealed materials to their clients without authorization, Mr. Guilds asserted that “none of [his] clients are going to believe that their attacker is not going to look at their records[,] . . . So every time someone else looks at the records, it’s another opportunity for [them] to be revictimized and for [their] privacy to be invaded.”27

Mr. Roger Bruce, senior government appellate counsel for the Air Force, agreed that the current Rules for Courts-Martial do not sufficiently protect a victim’s privacy interests. He recommended revising R.C.M. 1103A to require that CCAs conduct their own in camera review of a victim’s mental health records not released to counsel at trial before they permit appellate counsel to review the records on appeal. Under his proposal, if the CCA determines that the judge did not abuse his or her discretion in refusing to release the records, the CCA would order the records to remain sealed. The accused could seek further appellate review of that decision at the CAAF, and the CAAF also would be required to conduct its own in camera review. If instead the CCA determines that the military judge abused his or her discretion in refusing to release the sealed records at trial, then before releasing the records the CCA would be required to notify the victim, the appellate defense counsel, and the appellate government counsel and provide them with an opportunity to be heard. Mr. Bruce commented, “Such a procedure would provide due process to all [and] an opportunity to be heard.”28

Appellate defense counsel appearing before the JPP expressed grave concerns about restricting appellate counsel examination of sealed records. They emphasized that R.C.M. 1103A adequately “limits access of the record to certain trusted agents within the appellate arena who have a legal and ethical obligation to review the record.”29 Captain Andrew House, Director of the Navy-Marine Corps Appellate Defense Division, explained that military appellate defense counsel are bound by the rules of professional conduct and are not authorized to share, distribute, or discuss sealed materials with any party without official reason. He added that “better awareness of the professional responsibilities and expectations placed on military defense counsel as both attorneys and military officers might help diminish victim concerns on privacy exposure.”30

Appellate defense counsel took the position that the current version of R.C.M. 1103A “strike[s] the necessary balance between protecting the rights of victims and ensuring that appellants’ due process rights are protected.”31 They noted that limiting counsel’s access to sealed materials may have significant effects on due process, such as increasing the possibility that erroneous exclusions of exculpatory evidence at trial will not be discovered and corrected on appeal.32 One counsel likened the work of appellate defense counsel to “grad[ing] everyone’s [home]work”—meaning that appellate defense counsel must “scrutinize the evidentiary rulings of the military judge and assess whether counsel, both trial and defense, fulfilled their respective constitutional obligations.”

In the view of another counsel, “Ensuring that appellate defense counsel has access to the whole record is a vital component of a military justice system that vindicates society’s strong interest in ensuring the reliability of convictions through appellate review.”

In discussing an amendment to R.C.M. 1103A to require that appellate courts conduct in camera reviews of records prior to allowing appellate counsel examination, several presenters observed that trial and appellate judges in the military, unlike their federal civilian counterparts, are not tenured and are in general less able to benefit from multiple years of judicial experience. Often they are on the bench for only a couple of years. Concerns about a judge-centric approach to sealed materials were shared by civilian appellate defense counsel, who told the Panel that the effectiveness of in camera reviews of sealed materials at the appellate stage depends on the experience and background of judges.

D. JPP Findings and Recommendations

The JPP supports the JSC’s proposed amendment to R.C.M. 1103A(b)(4)(B)(i) regarding appellate counsel examination of sealed materials released to counsel at trial. The JPP agrees that in situations in which sealed materials are released to counsel at trial, appellate counsel should be allowed to examine the sealed materials upon a “colorable showing” that examination is reasonably necessary to a proper fulfillment of their responsibilities. The JPP understands that a “colorable showing” is not a high threshold but would serve to filter out irrelevant requests for records.

However, the JPP finds that in situations in which sealed records are reviewed in camera by a military judge but not released to counsel at trial, both appellate counsel and the person whose records are about to be examined should be afforded notice and an opportunity to be heard. Therefore, the JPP recommends that the JSC revise its proposed amendment to R.C.M. 1103A(b)(4)(B)(ii) to include the following language: “Prior to a decision to permit examination of material described in this subparagraph, notice and an opportunity to be heard shall be given to any person whose records are about to be examined and to appellate counsel.”

III. Victim Notice of Appellate Proceedings

A. Background and Current Practice

Currently, there is no statutory requirement that victims receive notice of appellate proceedings. Article 6b of the UCMJ, which was passed in 2013 as part of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2014, grants a victim of an offense under the UCMJ the right to reasonable, accurate, and timely notice of certain enumerated proceedings, including an Article 32 preliminary hearing and a court-martial.37 However, the statute does not explicitly grant victims the right to notice of appellate proceedings.38

The Department of Defense (DoD) uses DD Form 2703, “Post-Trial Information for Victims and Witnesses of Crime,” to inform victims and witnesses of crime about the post-trial process and their rights during that process. In March 2016, the DoD revised the form to explain the appellate process; such information had not been provided in previous versions of the form.39 The current form states:

All court-martial convictions are either reviewed by a judge advocate or subject to some form of appellate review. An appeal is when a higher court reviews the decisions made by lower courts to determine if a legal error was made. The post-trial appeal process can take a long time. Depending on the offense, an accused can choose to waive appellate review. A victim has the right to be notified in advance of the date and time of any appellate courtroom hearings, and to be notified of the final decision of any appellate court or judge advocate review.40

DD Form 2703 further advises the victim to provide his or her contact information on another form, DD Form 2704, if he or she wants to exercise any post-trial rights.41

The JPP heard testimony about the Services’ different procedures for providing victims with notice of appellate matters. The Army has created a position within the Clerk of Court’s Office called the 37 Article 6b of the UCMJ provides that victims have the right to notice of any of the following: a public hearing concerning the continuation of confinement prior to trial of the accused, a preliminary hearing under Article 32 of the UCMJ relating to the offense, a court-martial relating to the offense, a public proceeding of the service clemency and parole board relating to the offense, or the release or escape of the accused. See 10 U.S.C. § 806b(a) (UCMJ art. 6b(a)).

appellate victim liaison (AVL). The AVL obtains the victim’s contact information from DD Form 2704, if available, or from the record of trial. When a case arrives at the Army CCA, the AVL sends a letter to the victim or to his or her counsel explaining the appellate process and asking the victim if he or she wishes to continue receiving notifications about the case. If the victim so elects, the AVL sends letters to the victim advising when oral argument on the case is scheduled and when the Army CCA has completed appellate review. The letters explain what happened in the case and include the opinion of the court. The AVL sends additional letters if the case goes before the CAAF.

In contrast to the Army, the other Services have procedures for notifying victims about appellate proceedings that are less formal and less centralized. For example, in the Air Force, if a victim is represented by counsel on appeal, an appellate government paralegal forwards appellate briefs and motions to the victim’s counsel or another address that the victim designates.

In December 2016, Congress included in the Military Justice Act of 2016 a provision addressing the development and implementation of a program for the military justice system dealing with case management, data collection, and data accessibility. It mandates that the Secretary of Defense “prescribe uniform standards and criteria” to facilitate “access to docket information, filings, and records, taking into consideration restrictions appropriate to judicial proceedings and military records.” However, these standards and criteria are not required to take effect until December 2020.

B. Comparison to Civilian Practice

In contrast to Article 6b of the UCMJ, the federal Crime Victims’ Rights Act (CVRA) provides that crime victims in federal criminal proceedings have the “right to reasonable, accurate, and timely notice of any public proceeding . . . involving the crime or of any release or escape of the accused.” The CVRA does not differentiate between trial and appellate proceedings.

In order to meet the requirements under the CVRA, the U.S. Department of Justice implemented the automated Victim Notification System (VNS) in 2001. At the inception of a case, a federal investigative agency, such as the Federal Bureau of Investigation or the U.S. Postal Inspection Service, enters victim contact information into VNS. The system is used to provide information to federal victims about events pertaining to their cases, including appellate developments, such as when a criminal case is appealed, the date of oral argument, and the outcome of the appeal.

The federal courts also maintain the Public Access to Court Electronic Records (PACER) system, an electronic public access service that enables users to obtain case and docket information from federal appellate, district, and bankruptcy courts. Registered litigants are separately notified of the electronic

In addition, many states have constitutional provisions, statutes, or policies requiring that victims receive notice of criminal appellate proceedings. In Colorado, for example, if a person convicted of a crime seeks appellate review, the district attorney or the office of the attorney general, whichever is appropriate, must inform the victim of the status of the case and of the decision of the court. In practice, the attorney general or district attorney is in contact with the victim by phone or mail and keeps the victim as informed as he or she requests.

C. Proposals and Considerations

At the JPP’s April 2016 public meeting, the SVC/VLC program managers explained that victims often are not aware when their cases are reviewed at the appellate level and when major events occur at the appellate stage. They proposed amending Article 6b of the UCMJ to specify that victims have “[t]he right to reasonable, accurate, and timely notice and all pleadings filed by all parties in . . . [a] court-martial and any appellate matters, to include post trial review, relating to the offense.” Similarly, Section 547 of Senate Bill S. 2943 would have amended Article 6b to provide victims with notice of “[a] court-martial and any appellate matters, including post-trial review, relating to the offense.”

Many presenters appearing before the JPP agreed that victims should receive notice of appellate matters. Ms. Meg Garvin, Executive Director of the National Crime Victim Law Institute, argued that to ensure procedural justice, a victim who has a right at stake must receive notice when that right is implicated in a judicial proceeding. Failure to provide notice to the victim means that “the person with a direct and personal interest in the outcome of a particular decision would be left in the dark.”

Mr. Guilds asserted that a victim should receive comprehensive and timely notice of all appellate developments, not just those that directly involve the victim’s rights. He noted that “everything matters to rape survivors when it comes to the details of their attacker’s criminal prosecution. . . . Issues decided on appeal could potentially result in the release or retrial of the convicted assailant, outcomes that obviously directly impact the victim.” Therefore, victims must have “free and unfettered access to information about the criminal process.”

50 See, e.g., GA. CODE ANN. § 17-17-12(a) (requiring that upon written request of the victim, the prosecuting attorney shall notify the victim (1) if the accused has filed an appeal of his conviction, (2) about the time and place of any appellate court proceedings, and (3) about the result of the motion or appeal).

55 See Appendix B.
Some presenters, however, were troubled by the breadth of the statutory proposals on notice. First, they commented that notice should be required not for “any appellate matters” but only for those appellate actions that could reasonably implicate a victim’s rights, such as matters involving Military Rule of Evidence 412, 513, or 514.\(^{58}\) One counsel noted that most appeals do not directly implicate victims’ rights.\(^{59}\) Another counsel observed that requiring notice of all appellate matters, even those in which the victim has no legal interest, might be counterproductive for the victim.\(^{60}\)

Second, presenters pointed out that because trials often include allegations involving multiple victims, the SVC/VLC program managers’ proposal that victims receive “all pleadings filed by all parties” would lead to undesirable consequences.\(^{61}\) In a public comment, Mr. Paul Koffsky, Deputy General Counsel at the Department of Defense, explained that such a requirement would result in court filings pertaining to rape shield evidence or mental health records of one victim being served on all other victims in the case. This outcome would likely deter some victims from participating in the military justice system.\(^{62}\)

In addition, Mr. Koffsky emphasized that under the Military Rules of Evidence and Rules for Courts-Martial, counsel are permitted to make ex parte filings under certain circumstances. Were it required that victims receive “all pleadings filed by all parties,” ex parte filings that were not served on the opposing party would still be served on any victim in the case.\(^{63}\)

Finally, some presenters explained that providing notice to victims would be burdensome in situations in which a victim is not represented by counsel on appeal.\(^{64}\) Mr. Koffsky noted that this requirement is likely to be particularly onerous for appellate defense counsel, who are usually the first party to make an appellate filing and would have the responsibility of locating the victim.\(^{65}\) Presenters offered suggestions for reducing this burden, such as providing victims with an opt-in mechanism after a conviction if they wish to receive notice of appellate events and requiring that victims keep their contact information up to date.\(^{66}\) Presenters also observed that once an online access system is created, as required by the Military Justice Act of 2016, a victim will be able to automatically receive notice when a party files an appellate motion or brief. 67

D. JPP Findings and Recommendations

The JPP believes that victims must be provided with notice of appellate matters so that they can stay apprised of events that may directly affect their rights and interests.

The JPP supports the provision in the Military Justice Act of 2016 that requires the development and implementation of a program for the military justice system dealing with case management, data collection, and data accessibility. Such a program, if similar to the federal PACER system, would enable all victims to receive appropriate notice of appellate proceedings. This provision may not take effect until December 2020, however, and the JPP believes that the Services must address the lack of victim notice of appellate proceedings in the interim.

Prior to implementation of the statutorily required uniform system, the JPP recommends that the Services formalize procedures to provide victims in sexual assault cases (1) with timely notice, unless declined, of significant appellate matters, including but not limited to the date and time of the filing of appellate pleadings and briefs, of any appellate courtroom proceedings, of the date when the case is taken under submission, and of the final decision and any opinion of any appellate court, and (2) with convenient access to any unsealed documents filed in the case, if requested. The JPP believes that the development of these interim procedures should be left to the Services, each of which is best positioned to devise the exact mechanisms that fit its own unique organizational structure until the standardized DoD system is implemented.

Drawing on information received at its public meetings, the JPP finds that the Army’s approach of using an appellate victim liaison to contact victims and provide them with status updates about the case on appeal is an exemplary best practice.

Victim Standing in Post-Conviction Appellate Proceedings

A. Background and Current Practice

Although Article 6b of the UCMJ does not explicitly grant victims standing in post-conviction appellate proceedings, victims have the ability to be heard on appeal in cases in which courts allow it through the filing of amicus curiae briefs. Rule 26 of the CAAF Rules of Practice and Procedures states that an amicus brief may be filed (1) by an appellate government or defense division of an armed Service other than that in which the case has arisen, (2) by invitation of the court, or (3) by motion for leave to file granted by the court as a matter of discretion. If submitted under the third option, the motion or brief must contain a statement of the movant’s interest and explain why the matters asserted are relevant to the disposition of the case.68 Similarly, the Army CCA, Air Force CCA, Navy-Marine Corps CCA, and Coast Guard CCA all allow an amicus curiae to file a brief by leave of the court, granted on motion.69

Judge James Baker, the former Chief Judge of the CAAF who authored the court’s 2013 opinion in LRM v. Kastenberg, told the JPP that Kastenberg held that victims have standing to protect their M.R.E. 412, 513, or 514 interests in evidentiary hearings at courts-martial.70 In Kastenberg, the CAAF stated that “there is long-standing precedent that a holder of a privilege has a right to contest and protect the privilege.”71 However, the CAAF did not address appellate standing. Thus, whether and how this proposition applies on appeal has not been settled before the CAAF. Judge Baker further noted that Kastenberg was a 3–2 decision, and thus, if the JPP or the Congress desires clarity and constancy on this point, the Congress should expressly and clearly either provide for or not provide for appellate standing in the UCMJ.72

The federal CVRA, like Article 6b of the UCMJ, does not expressly provide victims with the right to participate in post-conviction appellate proceedings. A few federal appellate courts have allowed victims to intervene on direct appeal.73 In U.S. v. Laraneta, the Seventh Circuit permitted two victims to intervene on appeal to defend the restitution award they received in the district court. The court contrasted intervention at the district court stage with intervention at the appellate stage:

The complications of intervention are many fewer at the appellate stage, where participation is limited to filing briefs and, at the appellate court’s discretion, participating in oral argument, which we permitted in this case. The [CVRA] allows a crime victim whose claim of restitution is denied to seek mandamus in the court of appeals, but makes no provision for participation by a victim who has been successful in the district court.

Noting that the government in this case had declined to defend the victims’ restitution award on appeal, the court added: “The case for intervention is most compelling when a person has a direct financial stake in a case and cannot be certain that any party has an interest in defending that stake.”

The laws in most states, like federal law, do not expressly grant victims standing to enforce their rights in post-conviction appellate proceedings. In her testimony before the JPP, Ms. Garvin estimated that between seven and ten states have statutes or constitutional provisions granting victims standing to assert their rights in any court with jurisdiction over the criminal matter in question, with victims in at least six states having actually participated on appeal. Among the states that do provide victims with express legal standing are Arizona, Florida, Indiana, and Texas. In addition, Maryland has a rule permitting a victim to “participate [in a criminal proceeding] in the same manner as a party regarding the rights of the victim or victim’s representative.” The Court of Appeals of Maryland has found that under this rule, if a victim is content with a trial court action, but a party appeals, the victim has the right to participate in the criminal appeal regarding issues that “directly and substantially” affect the victim’s rights. This includes participating in oral argument and filing a brief.

C. Proposals and Considerations

The SVC/VLC program managers identified the inability to participate in the appellate process as one of the obstacles that victims face. Colonel Katherine McDonald, Officer-in-Charge of the Victims’

Legal Counsel Organization of the U.S. Marine Corps, told the Panel that SVCs and VLCs are “going to stagnate at the trial court level if [they] don’t have access to the appellate level.” Colonel deCamara added that the idea that a victim’s Article 6b rights end at trial is “an arbitrary line in the sand,” particularly since a conviction is not final until all appeals have been exhausted, as R.C.M. 1209 specifies.

The SVC/VLC program managers proposed language to amend Article 6b of the UCMJ to give victims the right to be reasonably heard at “[a]ny and all appellate matters and hearings arising out of the offense.” Further, the proposed language states, “If counsel for the accused or the Government file appellate pleadings in a matter arising out of the offense, the victim . . . may file pleadings as a real party in interest when a victim’s statutory, regulatory or Constitutional right is implicated.” The language in Section 547, which is narrower, would have amended Article 6b to provide that “[i]f counsel for the accused or the Government files appellate pleadings under [Article 66 or 67, UCMJ], the victim . . . may file pleadings as a real party in interest when the victim’s rights under [M.R.E. 412, 513, or 514] are implicated.”

Presenters in favor of a statute allowing victims to file motions and briefs in post-conviction appellate proceedings emphasized that victims must have “their voices meaningfully integrated throughout the entirety of the [criminal justice] process.” Ms. Garvin argued that any person who meets the three-pronged test of standing—jury, causation, and redressability—should have the right to be heard by a trial and appellate court when that person’s rights are at issue, further insisting that “[c]rafting any artificial list of [when a person has standing] violates the fundamental principle of standing.” Drawing on lessons from civilian jurisdictions, she maintained that the best course of action is for the military to have an explicit provision granting standing to victims.

Other presenters cautioned against legislative change that would grant victims standing on appeal, noting the “unintended legal and logistical consequences” that would occur from making such “sweeping changes.” Many counsel raised due process considerations; among their concerns was that granting victims standing on appeal may cause significant delays and increase the chance that a case is overturned because the right to a speedy trial was violated. Counsel observed that victim standing may also create the appearance that the appellate process is stacked against the appellant.90 One civilian appellate counsel added that victim standing may chill appellants from raising certain types of issues on appeal.91

Some presenters questioned the need for victim standing in post-conviction appellate proceedings. Colonel (Retired) William Orr, Jr., former Chief Judge of the Air Force Court of Criminal Appeals, noted that most victim concerns are addressed at the trial level or by interlocutory appeal, and a victim’s interests post-conviction are normally, but admittedly not always, aligned with the interests of one of the parties.92 Similarly, Rear Admiral (Retired) Christian Reismeier, former Chief Judge of the Department of the Navy, contrasted a victim’s pressing need to be able to petition the appellate court for a writ of mandamus to prevent a right from being extinguished with a victim’s lesser need to participate in post-conviction appellate proceedings, at which the appellate court undertakes a review of the conviction and sentence based on the record.93

Presenters also disagreed on whether amicus briefs offered a sufficient opportunity for victims’ voices to be heard. Mr. Bruce argued that amicus briefs were underutilized by victims during the direct appellate review process, citing a case in which the Air Force specifically invited the victim and her counsel to file an amicus brief. The victim declined, instead choosing to litigate the question of her status as a party.94 Other counsel countered that amicus briefs are not a sufficient substitute for victim standing for two main reasons. First, amicus briefs are more appropriate for a third party seeking to raise broad policy considerations with the court than for a victim defending his or her individual rights.95 Second, courts have discretion to consider amicus briefs.96 Colonel deCamara testified that as of April 2016, the CAAF had rejected amicus briefs filed by Air Force SVCs in three separate cases in which a victim’s mental health records were at issue, leaving the victims “without any voice whatsoever.”97

In addition to raising policy questions and considerations, many presenters found some problems in the drafting of the statutory proposals. First, they expressed concern about granting a victim status in appellate proceedings as a “real party in interest.” Mr. Bruce explained that “real party in interest” is a term of art used for petitions for extraordinary relief and is inapplicable to direct appellate review. Judge Baker agreed that the term is confusing, predicting that different judges likely would interpret and apply it in different ways; in his view, the legislation should be explicit in granting victims standing in post-conviction appellate proceedings, if that is its intent.

Other aspects of both proposals that troubled the presenters were their definition of “victim” and the scope of SVC/VLC representation contemplated. The SVC/VLC program managers’ proposal would apply to “any individual who has suffered direct physical, emotional, or pecuniary harm as a result of the commission of an offense under [the UCMJ].” The proposal would further amend Article 70 of the UCMJ to state that “[a]ppellate victims’ counsel shall represent the victim before the [CCA], the [CAAF], or the Supreme Court—(1) when requested by the victim; (2) when the Judge Advocate General has sent the case to the [CCA]; or (3) when any Article 6b right is implicated during trial or in any appellate pleading or matter.”

Similarly, Section 547 of Senate Bill S. 2943 would have applied to “an individual who has suffered direct physical, emotional, or pecuniary harm as a result of the commission of an offense under [the UCMJ] and for which there was a guilty finding that is the subject of appeal under [Article 66 or 67].” Section 547 further states that “[t]he victim’s right to file pleadings as a real party in interest includes the right to do so through counsel, including through a Special Victims’ Counsel.”

Judge Baker identified a tension in the proposed legislation “as presently drafted and as contemplated”: while the legislation is drafted to apply to all victims, the legislation appears to focus on victims of sexual assault. He questioned why other classes of particularly vulnerable victims—for example, victims of child pornography or victims of hate crimes—should not receive the same rights and protections as victims of sexual assault, such as representation by an SVC. Rear Admiral Reismeier highlighted another gap in the legislation: while the statutory proposals would apply to all victims, they would not apply to other witnesses who might also have privacy interests or privileges at stake.

Mr. Koffsky noted additional problems with the broad application of the SVC/VLC program managers’ proposal to amend Article 70. As drafted, the amendment would provide appellate victims’ counsel to victims of crimes other than sex-related offenses—individuals who were not eligible for SVC representation at the trial level under 10 U.S.C. § 1044e. The proposed language also would require appellate victims’ counsel to represent an individual when any Article 6b right is implicated at trial or on appeal, even if that individual did not desire representation. Appellate defense counsel shared similar concerns about the expansive definition of victim under Section 547, noting that it might create “an expectation of representation” where no right to representation currently exists.\textsuperscript{106}

\section*{D. JPP Findings and Recommendations}

The JPP supports victim standing in post-conviction appellate proceedings. The JPP believes that appellate standing for victims is necessary so that a victim can defend his or her previously successful assertion of statutory rights if it is challenged by a party on appeal. The JPP does not believe that amicus briefs are a sufficient substitute for such standing, nor does it believe that the government’s interests will always entirely align with a victim’s interests on appeal. However, the JPP believes that appellate standing for victims should be limited to situations in which (1) the victim was heard at the trial level in relation to a specific issue; and (2) a party challenges a judicial ruling regarding that issue on appeal.

The JPP finds that both legislative proposals it considered regarding victim standing in post-conviction appellate proceedings are technically flawed. Most significantly, the JPP believes that the language in the proposals allowing victims to file appellate pleadings as a “real party in interest” would create confusion and would not clearly provide victims with standing on appeal.

Therefore, the JPP recommends that Congress revise Section 547(a) of S. 2943 to state:

\begin{quote}
SEC. 547. APPELLATE STANDING OF VICTIMS UNDER THE UNIFORM CODE OF MILITARY JUSTICE.

(a) APPELLATE REVIEW.—Section 806b of title 10, United States Code (article 6b of the Uniform Code of Military Justice), is amended by adding at the end the following new subsection:

“(f) APPELLATE REVIEW.—(1) If counsel for the accused or the Government files appellate pleadings under section 866 or 867 of this title (article 66 or 67) calling into question a prior judicial ruling in the case on an issue as to which a victim previously had standing and was heard, during appellate review that same victim may respond in the same manner as a party regarding that same issue, including through a Special Victims’ Counsel under section 1044e of this title.”

V. Victim Access to the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces under Article 6b of the Uniform Code of Military Justice

A. Background and Current Practice

When Congress enacted Article 6b in 2013, it required that the Secretary of Defense recommend to the President changes to the Manual for Courts-Martial to implement the statute. These were to include “[m]echanisms for the enforcement of [Article 6b] rights.”

Before the President had made any such changes, Congress amended Article 6b in 2014 to allow a victim to “petition the Court of Criminal Appeals for a writ of mandamus” if the victim believed that a court-martial ruling violated his or her rights protected by M.R.E. 412 or 513. Congress expanded this enforcement mechanism in 2015. The current version of Article 6b provides a victim with the ability to “petition the Court of Criminal Appeals for a writ of mandamus” if the victim believes that a preliminary hearing ruling or court-martial ruling violated his or her rights afforded by Article 6b or M.R.E. 412, 513, 514, or 615. In addition, if a victim “is subject to an order to submit to a deposition, notwithstanding the availability of the victim to testify at the court-martial trying the accused for the offense, the victim may petition the Court of Criminal Appeals for a writ of mandamus to quash such an order.” Under Article 6b, the petition for writ of mandamus “shall be forwarded directly to the [CCA] . . . and, to the extent practicable, shall have priority over all other proceedings before the court.”

While a victim has the ability to seek redress in the CCA, under current case law the victim may not appeal a writ denial by the CCA to the CAAF. In the 2016 case EV v. United States and Martinez, a victim petitioned the CCA for a writ of mandamus after a military judge ordered portions of her mental health records released. After the CCA denied the victim’s petition, the victim appealed to the CAAF. The CAAF dismissed the victim’s writ appeal on the grounds of lack of jurisdiction, finding that Article 6b “is a clear and unambiguous grant of limited jurisdiction to the Courts of Criminal Appeals” and that the CAAF “must be guided by the choices Congress has made.”

In a 2017 case decided by the CAAF, Randolph v. HV and United States, an accused appealed the CCA’s grant of a writ of mandamus under Article 6b. The CAAF specified the following issue:

110 10 U.S.C. § 806b(e) (UCMJ art. 6b(e)). M.R.E. 514 relates to the victim advocate-victim privilege and the Department of Defense Safe Helpline staff-victim privilege. See MCM, supra note 7, MIL. R. EVID. 514. M.R.E. 615 relates to the exclusion of victims. See MCM, MIL. R. EVID. 615.

“Whether the United States Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces has jurisdiction over a writ-appeal petition filed by an accused who is seeking review of a court of criminal appeals’ decision rendered pursuant to Article 6b(e), UCMJ.” The CAAF dismissed the petition for lack of jurisdiction, again finding that Congress has limited review of Article 6b petitions to the CCAs. The CAAF wrote, “As Article 6b is meant to confer rights on victims, not the accused, it would violate congressional intent for this Court to review Article 6b cases upon petition by the accused but not the victim.”

B. Proposals and Considerations

Presenters observed that neither Section 547 nor the SVC/VLC program managers’ legislative proposal would expressly grant the CAAF jurisdiction to hear a victim’s writ appeal. However, many urged the Panel to consider recommending such a change. In the view of Mr. Don Christensen, President of Protect Our Defenders, victims’ lack of access to the CAAF “serves as a barrier to meaningful relief and inhibits development of law.” Others emphasized the importance of uniformity and civilian oversight in military cases. Judge Baker noted that limiting jurisdiction to hear Article 6b petitions to the CCAs increases the risk that different Services will develop different standards or processes, resulting in discrepancies in how victims are treated across the Services. In addition, giving victims the ability to appeal a writ denial to the CAAF would allow civilian oversight of these cases, which is particularly important “in an area where the credibility of the military is at stake and the concerns about sexual assault are so well-founded.” Judge Baker added that the CAAF has tended to read jurisdictional grants literally; therefore, if Congress wants the CAAF to have jurisdiction to hear a writ appeal under Article 6b, Congress should explicitly say so.

Some presenters cautioned that permitting victims to appeal writ denials to the CAAF would further slow the resolution of cases, creating delays that would be particularly problematic if an accused was in pre-trial confinement. In contrast to the federal CVRA, which requires that a federal court of appeals decide a victim’s petition for a writ of mandamus within 72 hours after the petition has been filed, Article 6b places no specific limit on the amount of time allotted to a CCA to decide a victim’s petition. Allowing victims to appeal a writ denial to the CAAF would only exacerbate any delay that might occur. Presenters noted that this problem could be mitigated if Congress included in Article 6b clearly defined timelines for reviews by the CCA and the CAAF.

123 Compare 10 U.S.C. § 806(b)(e) (UCMJ art. 6b(e)), with 18 U.S.C. § 3771(d)(3) (Crime Victims’ Rights Act). Under the CVRA, the litigants, with the approval of the court, may stipulate to a different time period for consideration. However, the CVRA specifies that “[i]n no event shall proceedings be stayed or subject to a continuance of more than five days for purposes of enforcing this chapter.”

C. JPP Findings and Recommendations

The JPP is concerned that victims’ lack of access to the CAAF under Article 6b of the UCMJ prevents civilian oversight of CCA decisions affecting victims’ rights and creates the potential for lack of uniformity across the Services. In light of the CAAF’s recent decision in EV vs. United States and Martinez, the JPP recommends that Congress amend Article 6b to grant the CAAF jurisdiction to hear a victim’s appeal if a Service CCA denies the victim’s petition for a writ of mandamus under Article 6b.

The JPP recognizes that under Randolph v. HV and United States, the CAAF does not have jurisdiction over a writ appeal petition filed by an accused seeking review of a CCA decision rendered pursuant to Article 6b. The JPP has not heard testimony on whether the CAAF should have jurisdiction over an Article 6b writ appeal filed by an accused, or whether granting victims the right to seek review at the CAAF of a CCA decision on an Article 6b petition would also confer such a right on the accused. The JPP considers this to be outside the scope of this report and refrains from making a recommendation on this issue.
